MRS. LANCASTER'S RIVAL.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "A FRENCH HEIRESS IN HER OWN CHATRAU."

"How are they at Pensand?" said his mother, after he had talked about these for some minutes. "At least how is the poor little prisoner, for I care about no-"Miss Ashley?" said Kate rather sur-prised, and looking from Mrs. Strange to Anthony.

He had just dropped into an arm-chair, with his long legs stretched out and his arms folded. He made an odd face and "I shall have to run away with her. 1 must carry her away one of these days. It is unbearable. She talks to me; she tells me she is moped to death. 'My blessed child, said I to her, 'had I but wings, I'd take you for a long flight there no guardian could dream of overtaking us. We would hover over Pencand a few minutes, for the sake of a bird's-eye view of the place, and then away to the West.' That would be too delightful,' said she, and there was a tear under the smile."

"But that was naughty of you," said Mrs. Strange. "You only make her more restless and discontented."

"Perhaps so. But I will never ac quiesce to tyranny. To me there is nothing more terrible than the content of a clave. A prisoner who does not wish for freedom-ah, that is a depth indeed." "Does he startle you, Kate?" said Mrs.

"Not by saying that. I quite feel the ame. But when I was at Pensand she with the General. I have not seen her since. I'm afraid I have not thought Anthony?"

"A child still, that would be happy and adventurous like other children, if it could. A mind clear of suspicion, a heart full of faith in its fellow creatures, and love for them who never fed it on enything but husks. Has that an uninteresting sound?"

"No, indeed. Is she all that, poor head. And is she so very dull at Pen-

"She is alone. She knows every yard baside the gates, and the General forbids her to go outside them. He tells me she is shy, and does not wish to make acquaintances. Poor Queen Mab."

"What can be the General's reason, I wonder?" said Mire Forthcote. "Has Bandal been there much! Dick met him in the village not long ago."

"Randal?" said Anthony, springing from his chair. "Do you mean it, Kate?
Do you think the old General could be such a scoundrel? Randal! She has only seen him once; but she dislikes him, she shrinks from him; and no won-If I thought that any such a diabolical scheme existed-"

"Patience, my dear Anthony," said Mrs. Strange. "No more patience for me, in such a case as that."

"What makes you dislike Randal so much?" said Kate. She was afraid she thought it only too likely that General Hawke meant the heiress for his son. "Is there any harm in him?"

"Harm! I hate him." "Rector, it is a good thing that your people can't hear you," said Mrs. Strange.
"Mother, the whole parish knows, I here are ten times as proud. I don't be Randal, Kate? There is nothing I could lay to his charge in so many words, except being an insolent snob. But don't "Not very much. Though I must confees that I always thought him goodlooking. But I have not seen him for some time." "You never liked him; that is enough," said Anthony, who was gradmally coming down to his natural man-ner. "My mother never liked him. What is to be said for a young man, when two good women and a young girl are taught by their own heaven-born in-

He threw himself back in his chair again, leaving his head on his hand, and seeme I deep in thought, from which he was roused a few minutes later by his mother's voice.

'Anthony, give Kate her tea. And go and get some flowers." Mrs. Strange always ruled the talk in her own house, and never allowed a disagreeable subject to go on long. She made both Kate and Anthony understand that she would have no more at present of their respective grievances. They must make themselves agreeable; and so they did, both loving her dearly, and thinking her the best and wisest woman in the world.

CHAPTER X.

THE BRACELET.

Miss Northcote was not able that day to have it out with Dick, for she hardly mw him when she got home. He went to dine with some people at Morebay, was to stay all night and go with them the next day to the cricket-match. Thus his aunt had plenty of time to make up her mind what she would say to him.

daughter in the drawing-room, Some-thing had been brewing in the Captain's ing to his wife in private, and Mrs. Car-dew, though she had seen for several days that he was put out, had not asked him why. The Cantain generally smoked away his whims.

He came into the room, and found his wife working in the window, and Flora tending the letter, which she folded and put in her pocket as he entered.

"Is that from Dick Northcote? Can't he go away for a day without writing to rou?" said he.

"No. From one of my friends," answered Flora, a shadeof annoyance crossing and disaster, the leader and a few men barely escaping to reach home. Al-though he occasionally served affoat again, this practically closed the career ing her fair face.

"I am glad to hear it," said the Captain. "Stay where you are, Flora," as again, this practically closed the career she was slowly rising from her chair. "I want to speak to you.".

"Well?" said Flora, sitting down high esteem by the Government, and in

"Did you say you wished to speak to me?" said Flora, after a waiting few mo-ment." ment."

"Yes," said the Captain. "I have a question to ask. What is to be the end reformer of dockyard abuses; and enjoys of all this nonsense between you and young Northeote?"

"What an odd question, father! I hardly know how to answer it. But 1 suppose all nonsense comes to the same end," said she.

"You think, then, that he is only playing with you. And do you suppose that I am going to put up with that?"

"I don't exactly mean that. You had better not distress yourself. I can settle

"No. That is just the sort of thing I don't mean to stand. Though you are Mrs. Lancaster, you are under your father's roof, and I tell you I will not have these doings unless there is some God giveth the increase." "God's good reason for them. I shall speak to the fellow myself, and find out what his intentions really are." God's went out a soldier, and is come home a divine." In 1588 he instituted a fund

"For goodness' sake, don't do that!" said Flora.

"But I will, though. I suppose you think your chance won't be improved by being taken up by your old father. I shall speak in a louder voice than—than were furnished by the Queen, on condi-General Hawke would, I dare say, and maybe use some rough words."

"O, Captain, do hold your tongue! You're making Flora quite ill!" ex-claimed Mrs. Cardew, jumping up and hurrying to her daughter.

Flora had flushed crimson, and made a little start, as if she meant to run out of the room. But then she paused and of her much. She interested you, then, nothing for it but to hear her father to the end.

"A couple of geesel" said the Captain angrily to himself. "Sit down," to his wife; "there is nothing the matter with her, and I have not done yet. Listen to a few words of sense, Flora, if you Can.

Flora opened her eyes and bent her

"You don't seem to take it in," said the Captain, "But it is a very awkward thing for you to be run after by a fellow like that. It was a different thing when he was a school-boy. I tell you, unless I am convinced that something is to come of it, I won't have it at all. I'll let him know that he must behave to you as he would to a lady of his own rank!

"Dear me? So he does. I am quite able to take care of myself, I assure you," said Flora. "Pray leave me to settle it."

"Then you are quite sure that he intends to marry you?" said the Captain, fiercely.

"If he has a chance, I suppose he will. I don't know, really, father. I wish you would not make such a fuss about noth-

"Nothing!" repeated the Captain. " don't consider it nothing. It is not nothing, and so Mr. Dick Northcote shall find. You are a great foot for having encouraged him at all, but you must have somebody dangling after you. I thought you had had enough of these gentlemen. You would not get on with his relations any more than with poor ope, that I hate rascality. Harm in lieve they would acknowledge you at Miss Northcote bowed to me the other day, but as coldly as if she wasn't quite sure who I was. I don't like that sort men's faces tell their characters? Did sure who I was. I don't like that sort you ever like Randal?"

good-natured as she is." "Well," said Flora, with a sigh, "what do you want me to do?"

Before he had answered this question, which seemed to puzzle him a little, there was a ring, Dick's ring, as Flora knew very well. She smiled rather oddly, and glanced at her mother. Would her father attack him on the spot? She hardly thought so, in spite of all his talk. But after a minute's delay, the maid came in and brought her a small

ITO BE CONTINUED. John Hawkins. [Saturday Review.]

Journeying by the Cape Verde Islands, Sierra Leone and the West Indies, Sir John reached Florida, then supposed to be an island. Here, as in modern times, wild animals of every sort abounded. We read of unicorns, beast with one horne, which, coming to the river to drinke, putteth the same into the water before shee drinketh;" and how "the Captaine of the Frenchman saw also a serpent with three heads and four feete, of the biguesse of a great spaniell, which, for want of a harquebusse, he durst not attempt to slav."

Then, too, the commodities of this prolific land were "more than are yet known to any man," though their value was hardly appreciated by the natives, for the narrative tells us that they wanted not for silver and gold, and that for a hatchet they gave some Frenchmen "two pound weight of golde." Pearls of great size were found, but these were black from being roasted, the people procuring them not for their own value, but for the food yielded by the oyster. Sir Walter Raleigh has commonly had the credit The next day was Saturday. Captain of introducing tobacco into England, but Cardew came home early from the dock-yard, and, having enjoyed his after-dinner nap in the parlor, joined his wife and writes (1655) that "the Floridians, when they trauel, have a hinde of herbe dryed. which with a cane and an earthen cup head for several days, and he thought it in the end, with fire, and the dryed well to clear the air before Sunday, herbs put together, do sucke thoro the Thinking Flora quite old enough to cane the smoke thereof, which smoke manage her own affairs, he had said nothing to his wife in private, and Mrs. Carthey live foure or five days without meat or drinke, and this all the Frenchmen used for this purpose. This voyage proved successful and pre-fitable for the venturers brought home both "golde, silver, pearles and other jewels great store." John Hawkins' third voyage, in 1567-8, was also to the West Indies, where he disposed of the 400 to 500 negroes procured from the coast of Guines. From the treachery of the Spaniards, however, bad weather, and disease, this expedition ended in sufferMILK FOOD.
